5 June 2026

The 2026 FIFA World Cup will take place across sixteen cities in the US, Mexico, and Canada, bringing diverse security challenges.

Why it matters: The event’s global visibility attracts financially and geopolitically motivated actors.

- Attendees and infrastructure are primary targets, demanding comprehensive security strategies.
- Mexico’s cities face high physical risks from local and transnational criminal organizations.

Physical threats: Large crowds increase risks of theft and extortion, particularly in Mexico.

- US and Canadian cities are vulnerable to violent extremists targeting soft areas like fan zones.
- The Secretary of Homeland Security stated that security threats were particularly high “in soft areas outside of the stadiums.”
- The physical security footprint surrounding the games will reduce the likelihood of a successful attack or mitigate the impact.
- The most likely violent threat actors to plan attacks targeting the World Cup are homegrown violent extremist supporters of the Islamic State.
- There have not yet been identified communications from homegrown violent extremists, domestic violent extremists, or foreign terrorist organizations indicating threats to the World Cup.
- Protests and travel disruptions are expected, especially in Mexico.

Cyber risks: Cybercriminals exploit World Cup branding for scams and phishing.

- Scams include fake FIFA stores and fraudulent ticket sales.
- State-sponsored actors from Russia, China, and Iran pose espionage threats.
- Russian state-sponsored threat groups are likely to view the World Cup as a potential venue for disruptive cyber activity.
- Russian disruptive attacks against core tournament operations are possible but less likely than espionage, lower-level disruption, or cyber-enabled influence activity.
- Iranian state-sponsored groups are likely to conduct disruptive attacks against the World Cup and may pose as hacktivists for deniability.

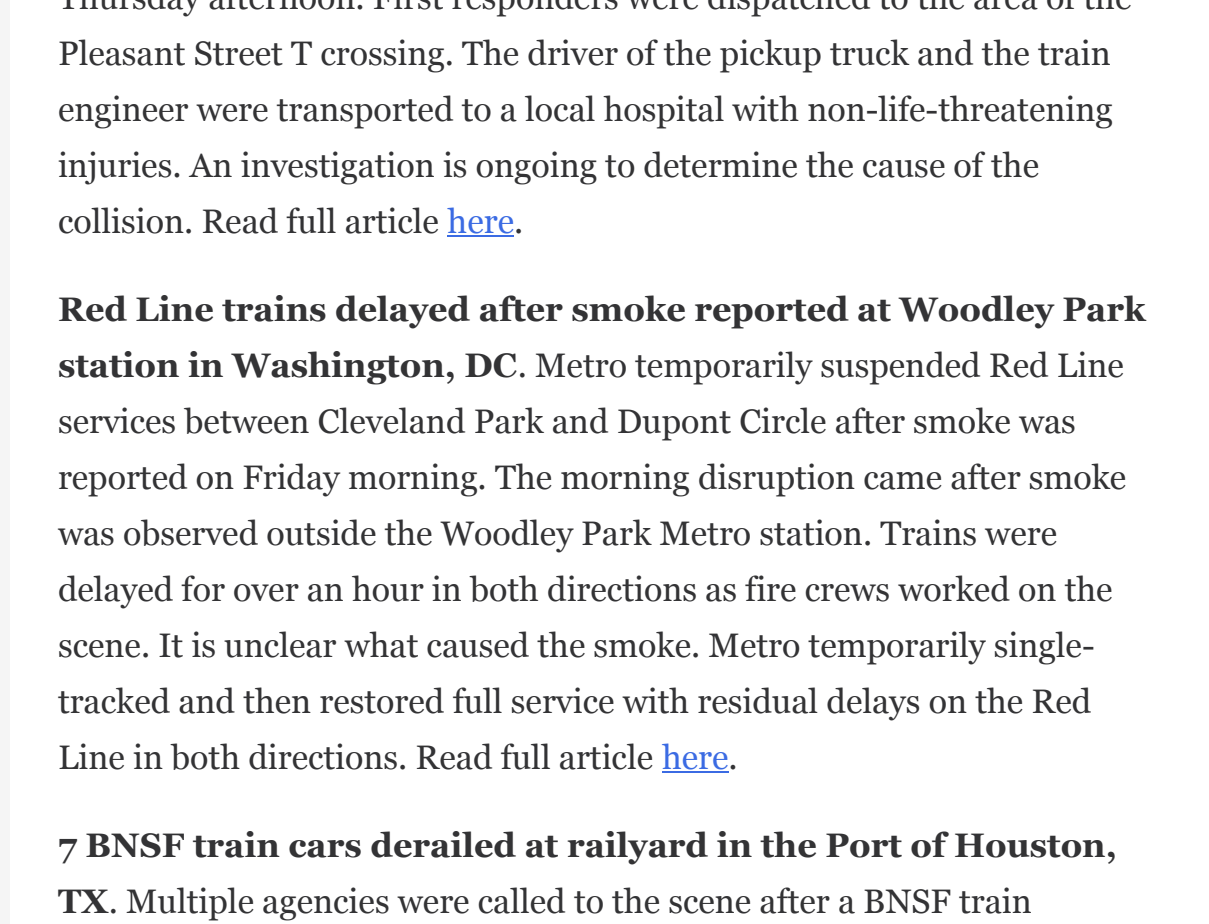

Influence campaigns: Russia, China, and Iran push narratives about host-country legitimacy and participation.

- Covert influence activities remain limited but could increase.

Vigilance: Organizations should monitor security risks and cyber threats, with a focus on geopolitical tensions.
