15 June 2025

Amtrak riders from Vancouver to Seattle can now bypass the Blaine border stop thanks to new preclearance at Pacific Central Station in Vancouver.

Why it matters: This change shaves time off trips, making World Cup commutes less of a hassle for fans traveling between stadiums and a more streamlined experience for customers traveling into the U.S. over the long term.

Preclearance lands at Pacific Central Station: Amtrak's new facility allows southbound trains to head straight into the U.S. after processing at the station, a first in North American passenger rail.

- Preclearance has long been available at select airports and now expands to passenger rail.
- The preclearance process consolidates inspection, security, and customs procedures into a single step prior to departure.
- This milestone, praised by Amtrak President Roger Harris, highlights a successful cross-border collaboration.
- The project was a joint effort with Washington State DOT, VIA Rail, Canada Border Services, U.S. Customs, Transport Canada, and Public Safety Canada.

Time savings, new trains and more seats: Upgrades will cut about 10 minutes from trips between Pacific Central and King Street Station in Seattle.

- New Airo trainsets are set to increase capacity and offer upgraded amenities, easing the travel rush on high-demand days.

Practical tips for cross-border riders: Passengers should arrive an hour early for preclearance.

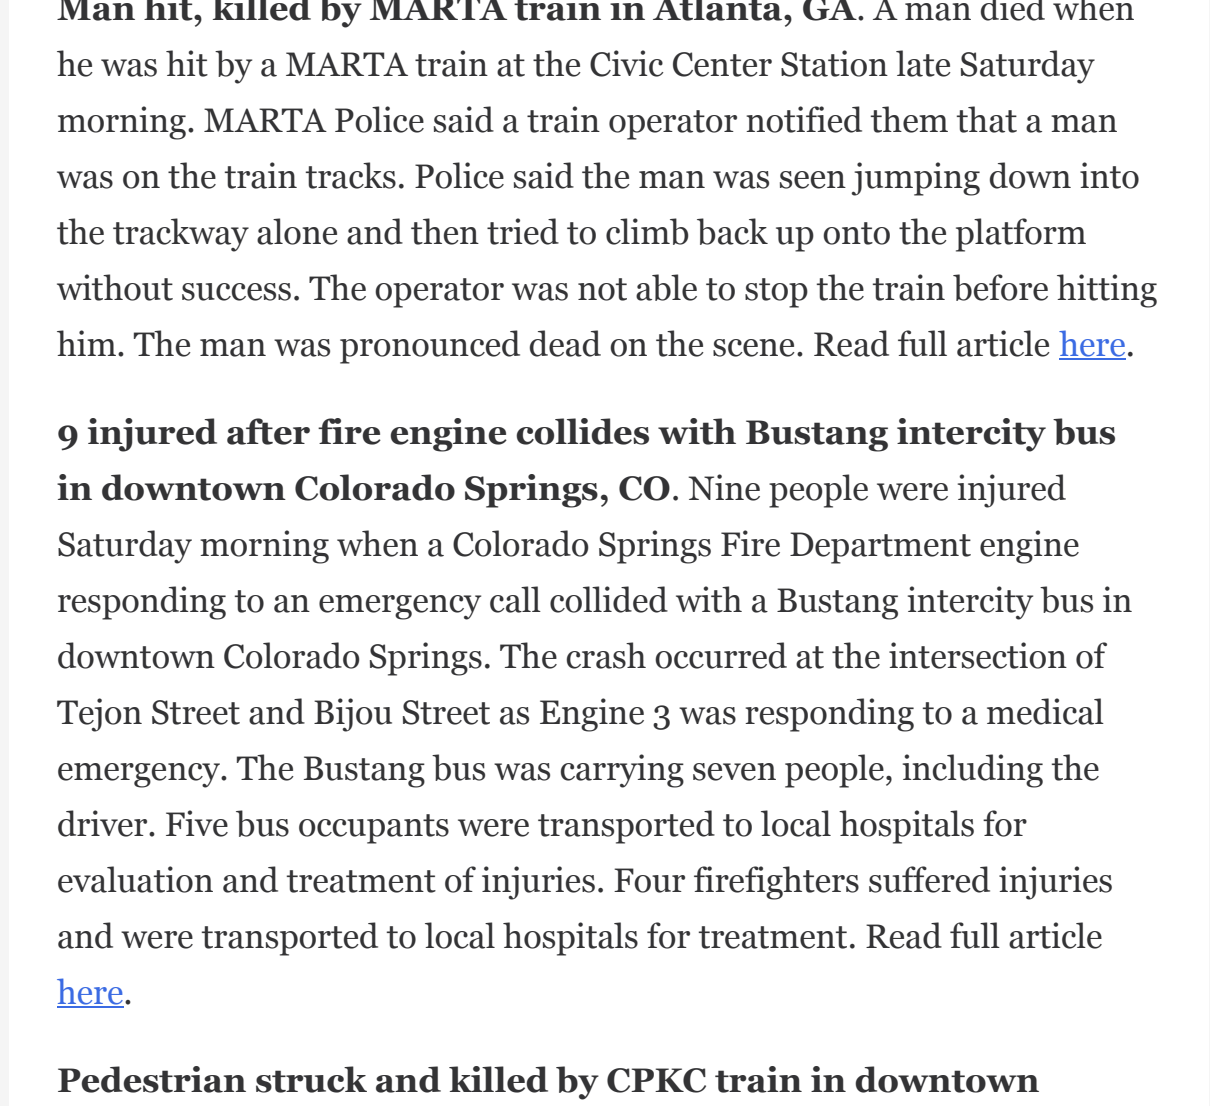

- The new setup is for southbound trips; Canadian-bound passengers follow existing customs procedures in Vancouver.

Why it matters for World Cup travel: With Vancouver and Seattle hosting multiple matches, the streamlined rail link is crucial for fans.

- The timely upgrade aims to enhance the customer experience beyond the tournament, but travelers should still prepare for crowds and stay updated on service alerts.
